"Alien is an anomaly in horror film history in a number of ways. First, it was the first film to actually take place on earth, despite the fact that much of the action takes place on a spaceship in space. This fact coupled with the fact that its budget was incredibly small ($1,250,000) makes it stand out in a way that few horror films have. Not only that but it has one of the greatest soundtracks of all time (and yes, we know there have been plenty of great soundtracks, but this one is still an incredible piece of work. Its how it uses a very minor musical theme that sets it apart from the rest of the genre's soundtracks. The best example of this is the music played in the Nostromo when Ripley first sees the alien in its "reptilian" form. On most soundtracks, this would be a low humming type of music that would be played during a significant scene to evoke an eerie, nerve-racking mood. Instead, Alien makes a more "easy-to-listen-to" type of music, but it's still able to evoke a sense of horror through the composition alone." "Alien (1979) is a film that resonates and still does for me. In a rare transition of evolution in science fiction, Alien truly had a visionary's eye for the future. The film sets up the mythology of the alien and the creature's life cycle in a very sophisticated way, yet doesn't talk down to the audience or make it seem too complex. It gives you everything you need to understand what's happening, yet holds back until it has to. It's a masterful piece of writing that works on so many levels – every once in a while you see something that even today would be impossible to do in any other medium. While the film tells the story, it never takes you out of it or makes it look too big or complicated. What Carpenter manages is to come up with this almost Shakespearean sense of mystery and wonder. Alien is the kind of film that you can go back and watch again and be surprised at the subtlety with which it tells a very complex story that's easily interpreted by even the most casual of moviegoers. And that, for me, is what makes Alien so good and so special." "There are two things that I always 82157476af
